A long term care plan can help provide FREEDOM and PEACE OF MIND

Welcome to our second of three educational eBooks designed to help you gain the knowledge needed to plan for extended care. At CLTC, we feel strongly that planning for this type of care is not optional.

In fact, failing to effectively address the subject in a meaningful and personalized way can put every other financial plan (investments, retirement and estate plans) at risk. And just as importantly, when there isn't a plan, the financial and emotional toll on the care recipient's family can be dramatic and life changing.

In our first eBook, we discussed,

- The Definition of Extended Care
- The Impact of Needing Extended Care
- The Odds of Needing Extended Care

In this eBook, we will turn our attention to,

- Facing the Cost of Extended Care
- The Feasibility of Using Personal Assets to Pay for Care
- The Reality of Relying on Public Programs
- The Types of Private Insurance Available Today

Facing the Cost of Extended Care

Over the course of our lives, most of us have confronted a single or ongoing expense that seemed daunting. It may have happened once, or many times. Thinking back, images of a first car payment, a mortgage, childcare or college costs may come to mind. It's likely the magnitude of that commitment was influenced by your financial circumstances as well as your ability to plan for that expense and the availability of options.

The ability to cover the costs associated with the need for extended care will be no different – it will be directly tied to your financial circumstances and the options established through advanced planning. Given the cost for this type of care, it is very likely it will far outstrip any previous financial commitment encountered by you, and more importantly, loved ones trying to provide care. Here's why.

The national average costs for extended care in the United States (2024)

- $6,483/month for a full-time home health aide (~44 hrs/week)
- $2,167/month for services in an adult day health care center
- $5,900/month for care in an assisted living facility (one-bedroom)
- $9,277/month for a semi-private room in a nursing home
- $10,646/month for a private room in a nursing home

Notes: Based on monthly medians from Genworth–CareScout (July–Dec 2024). In-home care assumes ~44 hrs/week; adult day assumes daily attendance.

The cost of extended care depends on the type and duration of care, the provider used, and the part of the country where care is provided. It is likely the level needed and the location of that care will change over time. As shared in our prior eBook, on average, men will need care for 2.2 years, and women for 3.7 years.

Let's juxtapose these costs with other common financial commitments that likely loomed large at one time.

- Mortgage
 - The median monthly cost of homeownership in the U.S. is $2,167 per month,1
- Vehicle payments
 - $742/month for new vehicles
 - $525/month for used vehicles²
- Center-based daycare
 - $1,094/month (based on $13,128/year)³

Along with the tangible costs of extended care, caregivers often face significant hidden financial burdens:

- Nearly 80 percent of family caregivers...on average paying more than $7,000 a year"
- 27% of family caregivers have switched to part-time roles or reduced hours due to caregiving demands AARP Press.
- AARP notes "Nearly half of family caregivers have experienced at least one financial setback," including retirement erosion AARP.
- One-third of family caregivers (33%) report job turnover or quitting entirely because of caregiving responsibilities. AARP Press

And there are daily struggles, hidden to most not involved in day-to-day care.4

- 56% find it difficult to help with Activities of Daily Living (ADLs)
- 46% struggle with the task of making care decisions
- o 33% can't meet their own emotional support needs
- o 32% find it difficult to coordinate MDs and other providers

When comparing the out-of-pocket costs of long-term care and its associated hidden costs, those earlier expenses that once seemed so large, quickly pale in comparison.

The Viability of Using Personal Assets to Pay for Extended Care

There should be no doubt that the cost of extended care can be very high. The burden of that cost will likely fall to the care recipient's family as they try to relieve the personal and emotional burden of trying to provide care themselves.

Odds are, paying for care will likely disrupt every plan that was put in place to secure future financial viability.

Clients may think their assets are sufficient to cover extended care, but a realistic discussion should reveal that portfolios are really "capital" in nature; that is, their purpose is not to be used to pay for care—or any other expense in life—but to generate predictable streams of income that will keep up with a rising cost of living that cannot be outlived.

Using capital to pay for care can create unintended issues with,

- Unnecessary taxes
- Market timing
- Liquidity issues
- Leaving a legacy

And perhaps most importantly, every dollar used to pay for care is one dollar less available to generate income to keep future commitments. And that leads to a financial death spiral.

In reality, a reallocation of income and assets = severe reduction in lifestyle.

The Pros and Cons of Relying on Public Programs

Many wonder what kind of financial assistance can be provided through government programs for extended care. There is a common misconception that federal programs like Medicare or the VA will help pay for care. But the fact is, these programs primarily cover medical procedures or rehabilitative care, not extended care.

Medicare was, and still is designed to cover health care costs, not long-term care costs.

Medicare will only cover the first 100 days of skilled care in a nursing home if.

- The skilled care immediately followed at least a three-day hospital stay, and
- The care recipient entered the nursing home within 30 days of leaving the hospital.

Medicare may also cover skilled care in the home for services like occupational therapy, speech therapy, physical therapy, etc. However, provision of these services is dependent on the expectation the care recipient will get well. As outlined in our first eBook, extended care, by definition, is a chronic impairment that most often requires ongoing custodial care. Extended care is not associated with an acute medical impairment where the individual is expected to recover.

As for Veterans Affairs, most longterm care services are available only to veterans who either have severe service-connected disabilities or pass strict means tests on their and their spouses' income. Given this, unless you are a disabled veteran who meets stringent standards, funding will not be available for extended care.

Medicaid is a state-managed program that will pay for custodial care in a nursing home – the place most people want to avoid.

Medicaid's long-term care benefits are the most commonly utilized and misunderstood. Medicaid is not synonymous with long-term care insurance, and many who plan to rely on it are unaware of this. As a result, they find themselves without the care they really need or desired.

Relying on personal assets or longterm care insurance, or a combination of the two, are the most realistic options for covering the cost of extended care.

Extended Care Solutions

Long-term care insurance (LTCI) has been evolving for the past several years and as a result, there are many more product types available today. Regardless of their design, all have the same purpose, which is to fund a plan to protect loved ones trying to provide care. In our final eBook, "Options for Transferring Risk", we'll provide far more detail about each type of coverage. In the meantime, below is a quick summary of each.

"Traditional" LTC insurance policies

 These types of plans are intended to cover just one person (though some offer a sharing provision and other couple's benefits if both spouses/partners apply) and are generally designed as "use it or lose it". There are no premium guarantees or money back if the insured does not access benefits.

Linked-benefit policies (also called hybrid, combo, or asset-based)

 As the name implies, these linked-benefit policies are annuity or life insurance plans with LTC included. The insured has the proceeds of the life policy's death benefit or annuity cash value for beneficiaries if all of the long-term care benefits are not used.

Life insurance with an Accelerated Benefit (ABR) rider

 The advantage here is that these riders cost very little and allow dual use of the death benefit.

REVIEW

Given the high cost of extended care, it is very likely it will far outstrip any previous financial commitment encountered by you, and more importantly, loved ones trying to provide care. Added to this, along with the tangible costs of extended care, comes inevitable hidden costs that are typically borne by the caregiver.

You may think well established assets will be sufficient to cover extended care, but a realistic review should reveal that portfolios are really "capital" in nature; that is, their purpose is not to be used to pay for care—or any other expense in life—but to generate predictable streams of income that will keep up with a rising cost of living that cannot be outlived.
